

Rosa Parks

The Mother of Freedom Movement

By Levi woodard

My reason why I chose to write about Rosa Parks is because I admire her bravery and courage as an African American activist. For example, she was brave enough to stand up to a white man who believed that black people should be sitting on the back of the bus. She even triggered the Montgomery bus boycott because of her brave actions. She also spoke out about racism and how hard it impacted the black community.

Rosa Parks was born in Tuskegee, Alabama, February 4th 1913. The racial lifestyle in Montgomery might have made her experience more about racism. Later on in life, she married a man named Raymond Parks. He was part of the NAACP, a group that helped colored people impacted by racial abuse. She later became the secretary of the NAACP so she can help people too.

Without Rosa Parks, this country would have not been the same. Think about all of the great seats on the bus, the clear water fountains, and the places we would go because of her. She fought for all of this to make our country better. It hasn't changed so much after she died because some people today still believe in racism and injustice towards blacks. But she did help make things better in this country.

This woman's bravery and courage helps me keep going. Her actions inspire me to help people one day. I'm sure of this because she did all of this and it also makes me think I can do this too. She is a brilliant African American woman.
